The Herald's new Hoe quadruple press-four presses in one-is undergoing a thorough test to make sure that it is in perfect running shape to turn off the big editions of this paper. The motors are likewise being tested. A newspaper starts but once, and it must start right. The Herald intends to start right. Having started right it expects to go on forever. Some weeks ago it was announced that this paper would be in evidence "about October 1." It was a big undertaking, involving vast and intricate mechanical and electrical work, apart from the getting together of a competent newspaper staff, but the Herald has proved equal to the task. Today it has a complete, compact and up-todate equipment; a plant of which even a ten-year-old newspaper might well be proud. The equipment is now being thoroughly tested in all its branches, and the first issue of The Washington Herald will appear Monday morning, October 8th. Watch for it and send in your subscription at once, so that it will begin with the first issue of The Herald.
